

MEDIA PANDEMIC INFLUENZA PREPAREDNESS CHECKLIST – Contra Costa

This checklist¹ provides guidance for editors and publishers in developing and improving influenza pandemic response and preparation plans. These steps are not in chronological order. More information about pandemic flu is available at www.pandemicflu.gov. Similar plans should be developed for maintaining operations during emergencies that involve destruction of property and equipment, loss of utilities and impassability of roads and bridges. An influenza pandemic occurs when a new influenza virus emerges that people have little or no immunity to and for which there may be no vaccine. The disease spreads easily through person-to-person contact and causes serious illness or death. It can sweep across the country and around the world very quickly. At present, avian (bird) flu — H5N1 — is spread by birds. It is not spread through person-to-person contact. However, there is concern that it may mutate to become easily spread person-to-person. At that point, it could become a pandemic flu. In the event of a global disease outbreak, reporters and their media outlets will play a critical role in providing the public with information regarding vaccination, treatment, self-care, isolation and quarantine.
